

On some classes of random partition models and their applications

Fernando Quintana, Pontificia Universidad Católica de Chile

Random partition models have become quite popular, with many applications in fields such as classification, clustering and change-point detection. This talk will briefly discuss some of these models and their applications, including the case where the notion of repulsion among clusters is explicitly incorporated as a mechanism to encourage parsimonious representations. Throughout, connections with nonparametric Bayesian models will be highlighted.